Excerpt: .needed at the present time; and she almost dreaded their arrival in Glenville, lest the opportunity might be forever lost to resume it. She was musing thus when they arrived at the junction, where stages stood waiting for the Glenville passengers. How far is it to Glenville? inquired Mabel of Mr. Babson. Only fifteen miles, said he. Only fifteen miles was a great distance to Mabel, who had a horror of stage coaches, and of being packed in with women and children, dogs, cats, and bandboxes. Gentlemen will take seats outside, and make room for the ladies, bawled the obsequious driver. O, dear! sighed Mabel; fifteen miles, and no one to talk with! She moved along mechanically with the crowd, gazing wistfully all the while at a beautiful buggy and span of grays, that were impatiently pawing the ground, and longing for a trial upon the road. This way, Miss Green, said the voice of Mr. Babson; and almost before she was aware of it, she was seated in the carriage that she had so much admired. Dennis, you may ride on the stage, said he to the man holding the horses. I prefer to drive home myself. He must have observed Mabel's surprise, for her eyes were filled with grateful tears; but he appeared not to, and said, -- You will see enough of those people by and by. Some time we will take another ride together; and then I will ask you...
