Joan E McCarty, United States, 2013. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 229 x 152 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .I wore a red satin strapless dress, it was fitted, hugging my curves to the ankles and dropping in the back with a small tail. I wore the dress as a celebration of survival, marking a passage of time, much like a boy scout would don a new merit badge. I went to the mall for a photograph in a department store studio so as to be able to reflect later how I felt at this time. It was the only time I wore the dress, the significance meant just for me. The dress hung in the closet after the photograph was taken for a period of time until I gave it as a donation, hoping some young woman with little means would claim it for a prom. I tell this story, my story, with the hope that someone else might gain something from my experiences. It is not a complete autobiography but details of the events that were the most significant in shaping who I am today and hopefully giving the reader an idea of what kind of person I became. I understand that I have learned the most from the difficulties that life has given me and that others who shared parts of these experiences might see them differently with their eyes. Everyone has a story and experiences that color the way they respond to any particular event, but I speak from my heart and relate these events the best I am able. I may choose to leave out particular details, not to withhold information but to protect innocent individuals from harm. To get back to the wearing of the red dress, it had...
