Excerpt: . . . thought that a voice bade him sell his business, give the money to the poor, and devote his life to healing the sick. He was then in Denver, Col. , but soon after entering upon his mission left that city, and, traveling on foot, visited Kansas City, Hot Springs, Arkansas, El Paso, San Diego, San Francisco, and Albuquerque. At the latter place in July, 1895, he suddenly became famous. Crowds gathered about him daily, hoping to be cured of their diseases by simply clasping his hands. The following month he returned to Denver, but did not resume his healings until September. Meantime, a great multitude had gathered there to receive treatment from him. Schlatter is said to have refused all reward for his services, and when money was given to him in such a way that it could not be returned it was asserted...
